Stephanie Vibbert
June 25, 1980-January 20, 2003

Stephanie Vibbert was a poet, an activist for peace and justice, and a life-changing friend. With her death in January 2003, winter iced the quad and the campus grieved. Yet, anyone who had been touched by Stephanie—both her fire and her radiant smile—could not remain frozen for long. A student hung poster-sized copies of her poems around campus. A group of students and a professor in her ceramics class recycled clay from her unfinished project into a tablet and engraved her poem “Sound” into its surface. The English Department and the college’s Director of Publications put together a chapbook of her poems. Students raised money for the causes closest to Stephanie’s heart. It was a profound tribute to Stephanie that the campus absorbed her message and followed her example by turning its grief into action. Stephanie’s life ended in a car accident on Martin Luther King Jr. Day, as she was returning to Kalamazoo from a peace march in Washington D.C.—but her voice lives on. It urges us to listen more carefully, observe with more intensity, love with more compassion, and to commit ourselves to social justice.

~Di Seuss

Sound

Power, This.
 A voice is song;
 I heard it leaping
 loud and long-
 and dancing just
     beyond the pen,
 and wording threads of
     yarn and then

it cartwheeled
 from the tangled past,
 and froze a bolt of
 lightning fast-

searing spoken

silence broken
 tells each moment-

till it lasts.

Another Fell

mother, are these my wings, molting in a crooked span of rage?
 mother, when can I fly
 from this house of fools,
 wax running down my arms,
 hardening in the long fall,
 then crashing into the sea
 of my salted dreams?

I am still a daughter, is it too late to start making a woman's sense, with pinfeathers blossoming, belated,
 into down?
 what could I do when daddy wouldn't let me make my angel wings?
 I waited, taught myself,
 and fell like my brother,
 but without the benefit of legend.

so let me make sense of summer,
 swallow,
 we'll skim the river's edge on knife
 wings;
 long has mother stopped watching us at the window; daddy and brother are still pasting gliders back together in the shed;
 show me now and we'll surprise them
 later,
 our shadows uncroken
 on wet glass.
