Stephanie Vibbert was a poet, an activist for peace and justice, and a life-changing friend. With her death in January 2003, winter iced the quad and the campus grieved. Yet, anyone who had been touched by Stephanie—both her fire and her radiant smile—could not remain frozen for long. A student hung poster-sized copies of her poems around campus. A group of students and a professor in her ceramics class recycled clay from her unfinished project into a tablet and engraved her poem “Sound” into its surface. The English Department and the college’s Director of Publications put together a chapbook of her poems. Students raised money for the causes closest to Stephanie’s heart. It was a profound tribute to Stephanie that the campus absorbed her message and followed her example by turning its grief into action. Stephanie’s life ended in a car accident on Martin Luther King Jr. Day, as she was returning to Kalamazoo from a peace march in Washington D.C.—but her voice lives on. It urges us to listen more carefully, observe with more intensity, love with more compassion, and to commit ourselves to social justice.

`Sound`

Power, This.
A voice is song.
I heard it leaping loud and long—
and dancing just beyond the pen, and wording threads of yarn and then it cartwheeled from the tangled past, and froze a bolt of lightning fast—searing spoken silence broken tells each moment—
till it lasts.

---

`Mother, are these my wings, mothertail in a crooked span of rage?`
I am still a daughter, is it too late to start making a woman’s sense, with pinfeathers blossoming, belated, into down?
what could I do when daddy wouldn’t let me make my angel wings?
I waited, taught myself, and fell like my brother,
but without the benefit of legend.

`Another Fell`
mother, when can I fly
from this house of fools,
wax running down my arms,
hardening in the long fall,
then crashing into the sea of my salted dreams?`

To all of the graduating seniors that welcomed me to K winter 2000 in my infectious diseases class, thank you for a fabulous welcome! You made my first quarter at K very enjoyable and made me feel like this would be a good home.
